Yes, Google Gemini can access and use information from LinkedIn because LinkedIn profiles and posts are indexed by Google Search, often appearing in AI Overviews, but Gemini itself has restrictions on directly scraping private profiles due to LinkedIn's anti-bot measures and privacy policies, so it can't reliably pull specific personal profile details like a direct search. Instead, it uses public data and can help generate content for your LinkedIn profile (headlines, posts) or analyze public job data via its API for matching. 🔗

"There are many forms of ROI that provide long-term value. In the B2B marketplace, sales are not immediate, they often take months and years. Being top in mind with customers is a KPI to help make the sale. The key metric for that is the number of followers you have and are gaining. By gaining new LinkedIn followers is probably the best ROI there is as this leads to long-term customer value. Tom has accelerated my presence and continues to do so and as he says, "Your Network is Your Network." He is a superb content strategist as well without reservation he is the best."
